Sexuality education

The lack of comprehensive sexuality education in Hong Kong and the surrounding stigma deters youths from talking to trusted adults, instead finding information from alternative sources, leaving them vulnerable to unhealthy relationships.

Our Comprehensive Sexuality Education program aims to reduce crisis pregnancy among youths in Hong Kong. Teaching children and youths about sex and relationships in a comprehensive way should include not only anatomy based information but also must facilitate discussions with youths about relationships, safety, communication skills, decision making, values discovery, and activities to build self-esteem.

We can leave it to schools to teach our children about sex, but a more effective approach is to begin the conversation at home. We recommend that parents be the first in their child's life to talk and to start the discussion, and research shows that this is a child's preference, too.
